Wednesday, May 9, 2010 Alex Perez, a 3rd grader from Putnam County, was out for the school year at Scarsdale Charter School last week when he received a note from his principal. It was on the principal's letterhead with the signature of his teacher, who had been reprimanded for giving students mobile phones. The note said the principal's office was re-examining whether it was appropriate to give students phones during school hours. Scarsdale's policy allows phones to be used during school hours to "convey emergency information," but prohibits them from being used for "personal purposes." When Perez's principal took issue with the latter, the teacher, who works part-time at the charter school, was cited for giving students phones for "personal use." Perez's mother, a Putnam County school board member, says her son is very upset. He already faces tests, and worries that it could delay his advancement at the school. "He's very upset and feels like he's not doing very well," says the mother. "He gets good marks in reading and math, but he is actually a straight A student. He just wanted to have a phone and feel like he was part of society." With the latest device, a wireless smartphone, the phones are now even smaller and more powerful. And, of course, with most of us carrying around a cellphone, the phones are even more omnipresent. Perez's mother says the Charter School decided to suspend the phone for a week, and to follow up with a meeting with the teacher. She says, however, that there should be an exception made for kids who are in the gifted program. The phones could be part of an educational program. "He's the smartest kid 82157476af
